Scout is pushed into a struggle with his classmate, who had mocked his father to defend the niggers. On the questioning, Atticus agrees that he defends Negro, in particular that named Tom Robinson. He explains that if the case is a difficult and complex, it is important for his self-esteem. Furthermore, the conscience of him forces him to suffer on behalf of the injustice played by his community. Another reason to occupy the case is that if he didn't do it, he would not be able to represent his country in the legislature. Moreover, the case is equally important for him to be able to resist the anti-racial position of him. Christmas arrives with conflicting feelings for Jem and scout how much they have to spend at the Fincha's Landing, with aunt Alexandra, sister Atticus. They receive compressed air rifles as Christmas gifts from Atticus. Acquire familiar with relatives seems once again a tiring and scout job finds its cousin Francesco a terrible hole. Aunt Alexandra is indignant that Scout is still in trousers and not in a dress. Children make a very funny comparison of Aunt Alexandra with Mount Everest Scout and Francesco have a quarrel first on Dill and then above Atticus, that Francesco calls a Nigger-Lover. Uncle Jack medium among them. Uncle Jack is able to understand SCOT's mode to think and admits by Atticus as he himself is better for not having married everyone. Notes: Scout can't choose a fight when your father is in play. The behavior of him and his use of curses is greatly absorbed from uncle Jack, but he is unable to resolve the confusion. Uncle Jack has an interview with Atticus on children, and Atticus, knowing that Scout is listening says it hopes that children would trust him and come to him for answers, instead of depending on local gossip. Scout is surprised that the father knows he listened to - "And it wasn't just many years after I understand he wanted to hear every word he said." Atticus once again shows the character of him rich in him through his penetrating sense of child psychology. He realizes, as some adults do, which sometimes children abhor is told what needs to be done. In a very skilled way, the conversation with Jack Finch is maneuvered in order to allow Scout to know (who knows can be listening) that hopes his children would not be like the rest of the other citizens of the Maycomian company, who refuse to associate himself With blacks. Scout, child you're, is amazed at her father's perceptivity. Harper Lee has very cleverly outlined the depth of this father-daughter relationship. Chapter 10 Atticus refuses to teach children how to shoot and uncle Jack resumes the charge of giving them lessons. Atticus only says they can shoot everything except a mockingbird. He explains that nobody rides; They sing only for people to enjoy, so killing a mockingbird is definitely a sin. While going for a walk through the Radley house, TIM notice, Mr. Harry Johnson's dog, involves strangely. Children run home to inform Calpurnia. It turns out that the dog had become crazy, and Calpurnia rushes around, informing everyone about it. The sheriff, Mr. Heck Tate requires Atticus to break down the dog. Atticus kills the dog in a single shot! Children who had never been aware of their father's shooting skills are truly stunned. It turns out to be nickname their father's in youth was an ol, one one-sote. Miss Maudie then explains to children who if Atticus was such a nice shooter, he had decided long ago that he would shoot only when he would absolutely need to do it. She also describes it as a very civilian being to heart. Note: Mockingbird is mentioned for the first time. Atticus insists on the fact that a thrush, whose unique ambition in the It is to bring others like others, it should never be killed, being a virtual sin to do it. The reference to mockingbird is important for Tom Robinson's as well as in relation to Boo Radley. Atticus's excellence in the shooting stretches a lot of children who have never seen the father shoot at all. The explanations of Maudie clarifies the confusion. Atticus maintains an appreciable sense of property and civilization in this chapter. Respect for children for their father is raised several notches now. Jem, especially, that is on the stage of emulating father of him, he is very proud of him, who is demonstrated when he says jubilant, "Atticus is a gentleman, just like me!" Page 2 Jem and Scout have passed the practice of disturbing the Boo. Now they meet Mrs. Dubose, an elderly woman with a contortical look and a vitriolic tongue, who never lacks to get mad abuses on Jem and Scout, as well as Atticus and the entire Family Finch. One day, in anger of him, Jem reduces the tops of every Camellia bush of Privacy of Lady Dubose. Attic, of course, makes Jem go back and sorry with her. As a punishment, Jem is ordered to go to the house of Mrs. Dubose and read it for a month. Every day, she would read to the alarm clock, set next to her bed, would sound, pointing out the time for him to go home. A month after reading stops. A few days later, Atticus informs you that Mrs. Doubt was dead, leaving a box containing a perfect waxy camellia for Jem. Subsequently, Jem is said that the reading sessions had been conducted only as a distraction for her to overcome his dependence on morphine. Mrs. Lady had died a free woman. Notes: Jem and Scout grew up, but they cannot even exceed their anger if someone passes a comment to their father. Mrs. Dubose returns to children as an acid woman and Garrulla who can only say hard things about others. Yet, Atticus is quite scrupulous to insist on the fact that children respects her for her or her. The evenings in her house, reading to Mrs. Dubose, is a task of children, but the essential reason for this is revealed only after her death. She's desire to get rid of her dependence on morphine before her death, reveals her as a strong character, who would prefer to go through an exhausting experience to break the habit of dependence since he died as an employee. Even her gift for Jem is typical of her perceptive character. The Gift of Camellia shows you to have understood Jem's anger when he had cut Camelia bushes. Surveying the same flowers is the way of her to let him know that she understands the feelings of her and recognizes the same. Atticus stresses the fact that whatever Mrs. Dubose has had the courage revealed unquestionable - "It's when you know you licked before you start, but you start anyway and see it through, no matter what." Children learn a lot about the strength of the character and the determination through their experience with Mrs. Dubose. Chapter 12 Jem shows the typical signs of growth, with inconsistent moods and a short timing. Scout is recommended to leave it alone. When atticus part for the city for an official job, Calpurnia brings children for a service for a black church. Their presence is recognized by all the members of the Church, with the exception of Lula, a plangram, but the position of her is neglected. The scout is amazed by the procedure, especially in the lack of HymnBooks. Later it is said that most of them did not instruct except for some, including the Calpurnia. The sudden switch of Calpurnia to speak of colored people, even surprises them, and realize a bit double life that Calpurnia must lead. The preacher, Reverend Sykes virtually command people to donate money for Tom Robinson's wife and children. Jem and Scout give their pockets. On returning home, they are disappointed to see their aunt Alexandra in their front porch. Note: suffering that Jem suffers through the process of maturation is not fully understood from the scout, which lacks his company and the dill. And even the growth of him is evident, when he finds the work of the kitchen for interesting prospects. The day the. The. The time at the Black Church serves a can opener for them. They suddenly realize how intrinsically different from blacks and how they may have to face a mild opposition. But the welcoming welcome given to the rest of the members speaks a lot of the generous nature of the blacks. Furthermore, children also notice the general desire to help Tom Robinson. The reason why Tom's arrest is revealed, which had apparently raped Bob Ewell's daughter. The reader notes as well, essentially a black), has been adjusted towards the way of the life of the Atticus family; Having learned to read, and also talk like white people. At the same time, he has not forgotten him origins of him, and he attends the services with his Negro Kin of his church and passed easily to their way of talking when it is with them. Aunt Alexandra, is realized (in the next chapter) has arrived to stay and be a strong influence on children, a fact that is not pretty pleasant for them. Page 3 AUNT Alexandra makes you feel the presence of her from the first day. Atticus returns home the same day. Aunt Alexandra settles at home. She becomes the Maycomb Amanuensis Club secretary and holds at home. Every time she does it, she convenes the scout, to make her present guests. Aunt Alexandra, attempts to instill her label's sense in children is useless and atticus must talk to them. Attic seems to be severe and jug to children who fail to understand this sudden change in behavior of him. But in the end, he too remains and allows children not to take everything that aunt says, too seriously. Notes: The presence of Aunt Alexandra in the family is not immediately comforting since many adjustments are needed. Children who have never been used to so rigid education, find themselves at a loss. Atticus was probably pressurized by her sister to let her stay at her home, to better lay children, but not being such a stickler in the rules and codes of behavior, he too is in a dilemma. The basic reasoning of the things of Alexandra is right, but not having her sons of her, she is not able to understand their true nature, and therefore, it follows many uncomfortable situations. It is the practical and non-compliant nature of Atticus that allows children to believe that things are not so bad as they seem. Chapter 14 Scout asks attic the meaning of rape and a surface, but technically correct response is given. Additional discussions Discover their trip to the Church of the Blacks. AUNT Alexandra is indignant to this. Later Scout Listen to her father and her aunt discusses her. Aunt Alexandra feels that Calpurnia should not be allowed to work at home, but Atticus refuses to let her go. Jem recommends the scout not to irritate their father while he has too many things in him. The advice of him seems too high for the scout, which ends up arguing with him. Scout discovers something warm and resilient on the floor, and together with Jem discovers the dill under the bed. Penthouse is immediately summoned, which insists in informing his aunt Rachel on her escape. The DILL remains there during the night, and the scout is pleased to get his friend back. Notes: Aunt Alexandra reveals her pitan approach to her tight of her from her discomfort to children who attend the church with Calpurnia. Attic, however, not in agreement with her, in any case does not allow the scout to be educated with her, and insists on her apology from her. It is pretty sensitive to insist to not throw out the Calpurnia, knowing the value of her and the closeness of children to her. Jem, in a mature phase, seems to understand his father's tensions and wants to train them as far away as possible. The reasoning of him, however, was intent on the scout; Jem that advised is something that he fails to digest. Dill's return is a of better moments for the scout. He hopes that the three of them can meet while they were accustomed, and e themselves. Dill with all the fantastic stories of him, is a pathetic character; A child looking for love and attention, which builds stories increase self-esteem. Page 4 DILL is given permission to stay at the scout house for the summer. One evening, as the family is relaxing, heck Tate arrives with some men. A discussion is kept over the next process, and if Tom Robinson is safe in their custody. Children looks like a Fracaso, but Atticus Li Straw. The next day, being a Sunday, he is spent in church, but in Atticus evening he declares that he is coming out. In the night Jem is preparing to follow his father. Dill and Scout join him in this business. They find the father who goes to the maycomb prison. As they look, a group of men joins Atticus and I'm going to talk to him. The scout interrupts them at a time inappropriate and Atticus introduces them to leave. Scout tries to conversation with Mr. Cunningham but fails to arouse any reply. They finally leave. Penthouse was protecting Tom Robinson, in prison, but he turned out that Mr. Underwood had also covered him (Atticus), with a shotgun, from the window of him over the Tycomb Tribune office, in case someone would attack him. Finally, everyone returns home. Notes: Tom Robinson is a hot topic for discussion in Maycomb county, and various stands were detected in the process. Penthouse demurs to leave the case, even after a warning. To safeguard Tom's life in front of the process, Atticus also turns off to watch it in the Maycb prison. Jem has matured enough to understand the structure of his father's mind. But the scout is still quite immature and his attempts to talk to Mr. Cunningham on his interests, causes a little embarrassment. The Scout had prior to hearing his father and Mr. Cunningham discusses on the commands in their home. Atticus had legally solved the problems of Cunningham, on the earth of him and Cunningham had vocal gratitude of him. Asking what behaviors means, she had been divided by Jem. So even if you don't know her meaning and the background behind it, she had just mentioned the word for Cunningham. He probably wants to show that she too is enough to participate in a mature conversation. Cunningham, however, becomes embarrassed and is remembered in favor of Atticus, is not able to continue to threaten it. Therefore, the innocent observations of Scout, in a sense, is beneficial to her father. While the facts are, Tom, a man of color, raped a white girl. The fact that a black has attacked a white makes the process extremely precarious. Moreover, that Atticus determined to take the case (and therefore defend Tom) is not approved by people in general. Although the alleged victim in the case, the daughter of Bob Ewell, is what they call a. -- White Trash, she is a white, and therefore the possibilities of being sorry are extremely remote. Chapter 16 Aunt Alexandra is disapproved children who had a rendezvous in prison in the middle of the night. Children are worried about their father, especially due to the fact that Mr. Cunningham would try to kill Atticus, if it hadn't been for the timely intervention of Scout, with his little speech on commands. A group of mennonites goes into wagons. While the home of Miss Maudie pass, you comment on her love for gardening, considering him a sin. But Miss Maudie is stubbornly non-majan. It is the first day of the process, and the place is crowded with people who have come to witness the Tom Robinson's process. Mr. Dolphus Raymond is noticed sitting with colored people, sipping from a brown paper package (which presumably contains whiskey). Since the court is completely Children join Reverend Sykes on the balcony, along with blacks. The judge is nothing but the Taylor judge. Although he gives the impression of stimulating through the hearing, it is actually very sharp in his relations. The Tom Robinson case begins with Mr. Heck Tate is the first witness. Notes: Notes: Alexandra's disapproval is an expected, but penthouse, it is depicted as a person who does not necessarily take the side of his sister. He shows the slight irritation of her to her once every now and then. Mennonites were a strict Christian sect that does not accept any authority except the Bible and opposes anything modern. Spending Miss Maudie spends more time in gardening and less time reading the Bible is considered as a sacrilegious behavior, but Miss Maudie is not moved by their comments. A brief description of the Court is given and the meeting. The whites and the blacks arrived at
