Heading north of the border to save money on production costs and take advantage of the good crews and proximity to the Hybrid Hybrid of visual effects, the movie was "made it in Montreal, which I know instantly brings to mind ancient Greece for a lot of people, with aspiring winters and the French and all that", born Snyder, not Her 61-day filming ended the program in 2006. With a couple of minor exceptions, the whole movie was killed, against a blue screen, against a blue screen. Cinematographer Larry Fong devised an efficient method that combined overlight lighting and key that made a faster and more efficient shooting - allowed the prospect to change the change by turning the simple winter lighting: all the lights were pre-announced, so it was a matter of flipping a switch and then some tweaks. Since all the backgrounds were added later, neither the camera nor the actors had to move. This disoriented actors, is "because they didn't know where they were half the time, but because it was so physical, in the end they forgot about the blue screen" notes Snyder. Chris Watts, the Supervisor of Visual Effect A department of 17 and 500 other artists working in graphic structures around the world, had faced the challenge of creating a three-dimensional version of the three-dimensional world and adding elements that Weren did not in his novel that would remain true to it. They say that art is never over, it has expanded, and there is definitely a huge element of that in this movie. "I've made a lot of movies with a lot of shots and a lot of movies with hard shot, but I've never made a movie with twice the two hard shot," Watt states, whose credits include Gattaca, Waterworld, The Day After Tomorrow, Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban,布袋戲 Bridge, Fog and Pleasantville, which one of the first three in the movie and the last to start. When pose-compositing was completed, in January 2007, faced the logistics of 1,300 effects shots and the limitation of shooting an entire stage. "In the battle scenes, if we wanted to have someone walk from one end of the stage to the other, we could do it, but it would take a long time and it's not enough time," says Watts. "We will build these elements and stage them in a space, and then we'll move all the back with the CG people. We have hundreds of hits and thousands of people and even more on my desktop. We're an ALL-Mac department and I have 15 Gbs. Most of the compositing is done on Shake or Inferno," says Watts, who needed it to handle elements like fake water. "I shot some ocean at the Santa Monica pier and we used that for two shots, but most of it was digital water." A German company, Scanline, has digitally created all the elements of a scene showing the Persian boats crashing into the rocks. For another scene, depicting a burning village. "We shot a burning building from a lot of corners and smoke and put it together in an incredible sequence. "The scenes involving horses were particularly complicated." In the first battle scene, Watts reports, "we rode horses." Horses up to the edge of the blue screen and skied to a stop. This was a challenge we had through a clever editing and a compelling background. But the Persian messenger's race up the hill at Sparta really had to be shot outdoors. "We couldn't get the horses running fast enough [otherwise]," says Snyder. He was intent on having a real feel at 300 despite the artificial setting. "I didn't want the movie to look like it was made on a computer, like 'Polar Express.' The movie was shot on the movie. We added some wheat flares and lenses because I wanted it to feel rough. It is very organic-feeling. "With spouting blood showers and no fewer than three headoings, 300 earned an R rating for her stylized violence described by producer Deborah Snyder, the director's wife, as a "ballet of death." But according to Watts, "We shot with very little real blood because we had a limited production program, and shooting with blood can really multiply your shooting time by a lot, and we didn't want to have to have a lot of photo-realistic blood in the movie. "We would get us an NC-17. So [Grant Freckleton, the art director] VFX designed what we call 2-D blood: we splattered coffee on napkins, photographed and made some digital processes on it. We shot a lot of blood as items against the blue screen to get in, but we used very little of it because at the end of the day the 2-D blood looked a lot more like the comic book and we could use a lot more of it without shaking the rating card. Makeup people kept asking me when we'd use the blood. They had gallons of fake blood, but we never used it. On the set, Watts coordinated with the set design and costume departments to prevent problems. Costume designer Michael Wilkinson also showed a particular fabric that was beautiful but when you folded it, he developed this blue shine on the edges so as to get rid of it. It wouldn't work against the blue screen. The blue screen, rather than green, was chosen for several reasons. "We have a lot of red in the movie, and sometimes when you saturated the red on a green screen you often have edge issues, where you get a yellow color. You have to do the way light travels through the film and interacts with layers of emulsion," explains Watts. "Whatever the background color, took a little to get used to the actors. You need every part of your brain you can use to imagine because there is nothing around, only blue walls. You have to imagine with full concentration, à la santoro.
