It's so simple, some buyers have been waiting for shops to reopen so that they can return the unwanted merchandise that has been in the car trunks or in the closets since normal life came to a screeching stop in mid-March. But at many stores, the process of return will seem different from the way it did before the coronavirus pandemic. First, you will be on a socially distance line at the customer service department before you have a minimum contact with the cashier, which will probably be behind a plexiglass divider, known as a sneezed guard. Then, those trousers, blazers or shoes that you are returning will be placed in "quarantine" for at least 24 hours at most shops, many of which have also prolonged the return periods to accommodate the returns for when the shops were closed due to COVID-19. "We're quarantining returns that enter stores right now," Marina President Nancy Green told the United States today. "They go into a separate area for a period of time and then they are transformed again which is available to sell until they are damaged. " shopping reinvented: American shops, shopping centers reopen with masks, pick-up curbside and closed rooms Closes shop Coronavirus: Tuesday Morning to definitively close 132 stores in the first wave of failure closure. Is your store on the list? CEO of Kohl Michelle Gass said in an interview with USA TODAY that its stores have extended the company's "very generous" return policy of 180 days within 30 days due to the COVID-19 closures. The returned goods will be kept out of the store for 48 hours. "We also have an attitude 'just say yes', so if people are coming back things and it's out that we will meet the needs of the customer," Gass said. Kohl continues to accept Amazon returns, which he has done since last summer, but to help with social space, those returns are managed in a separate part of the store. Dick's Sporting Goods has extended its return policy from 60 to 90 days from the date of purchase and also accepts coordinated curbside returns for purchases made with debit or credit cards. Sephora extended returns for in-store purchases made on or before February 15, with receipts for 30 days of reopening and increased its return policy for online returns from 30 days to 60. But Sephora will not sell the returned products. "To protect the safety of our employees and customers, all returns of the products will be destroyed until further notice," says Sephora in his frequent questions about reopening shops. Return policies regulated at Walmart, Costco and Kroger In days and weeks after COVID-19 led to closures, retailers that were also opened regulated return policies. Some stores including traders temporarily suspended all returns or returns of selected merchandise. In some shops, returns are not allowed on the most in-demand items, such as toilet paper and sanitation. Since April 20, Walmart temporarily stopped accepting food returns, paper items, house cleaning supplies, pharmacy, clothing, and health items and The dealer says that if you need to return any item, even in such categories, and have a receipt, receipt, start the return process on the Walmart app or on the website. "It is easy and can allow you to complete your return without coming to the store." Walmart says in his change of temporary return policy, adding that for items that cannot be returned online, which once "reopening for affected categories, we will be prolonging the six-week return period for such articles." Costco says it does not accept toilet paper remains, paper towels, some cleaning products, rice and bottled water. Suspended target returns from 26 March to 26 April, but currently accepts returns again with a couple of changes. Items returned with hard surfaces, such as table games, are cleaned up and wiped out before going to the store floor. Target officials told the US TODAY, while clothing items are quarantined for three days from the return date.
