Most fire safety advice may seem simple and obvious, but they must be explained to children. not only to prevent dangerous situations and accidents, but also so they knew how to react in the event of fire. Children often play with dangerous objects that can start fires, but children should understand that they cannot play with flammable games or objects like firecrackers and candles. Only a small flame or a spark can grow and quickly turn into a dangerous and out of control fire. Explain to your children who launch something, like socks or a scarf or a towel, or almost anything else, on a heat source like a radiator or even a lamp, these objects could take fire. The same goes to put any part of your body near a fire. The electricity can also start a fire, and so it can an illuminated burner on the stove. It's easy to think about things that can cause a fire or take fire, but what happens if a fire has already started? Children should know what to do if they meet a fire and are in danger. Explain the following to your children: the fire spreads quickly and the reaction to fire must be just as fast. They should know the fastest escape route from the house, and should plan and practice it in advance with other family members. Teachers to keep on the floor if there is smoke, and do not open any doors if they are hot, because this could mean that they are opening the door to more flames. And in the worst case scenario, teaches your children to stop, fall and roll in case any part of their clothing or hair captures fire. Falling to the ground and rolling help to put the flames. This is true not only for children - knowing how to react in a dangerous situation for life can also save your life. Who doesn't love sitting at a fire with family and friends?
